Spiraling and Radiating Light
by Dan Corson

Acclaimed artist Dan Corson created two wall-mounted sculptures for a new parking garage at the Walnut Creek BART station. Utilizing reclaimed street light fixtures, the sculptures illuminate with various sequences of colored light, including patterns that are triggered by the timing of train arrivals and departures. Visible from both the ground and elevated train tracks, these dynamic artworks create an especially engaging and memorable experience for BART riders.

Intersect in Red
by Shayne Dark

At the gateway to Walnut Creek, monumental sculpture rises near VAYA, a BART station and adjacent to the freeway celebrating one's arrival in the city.

Oakland

Cascade*
by Randy Colosky

In an unexpected intervention, this work by Oakland artist Randy Colosky appears to cascade down the facade of a new apartment building in the Uptown district of Oakland. Its playful, dynamic quality delights residents and instigates double takes by pedestrians and drivers passing by.

Interior Art Installation Austin, TX

by Sabine Reckewell

Working from architectural plans for a new project called The Independent, the tallest building in Austin and tallest residential tower in Texas, Sabine Reckewell designed an elegant suspended installation for a prominent corridor. The sculpture's white nylon strapping is set off by the adjacent concrete wall and is visible from the pool area just outside the glass curtain wall opposite it.
